GENESIS OF THE PROJECT

Creating a Star Wars project was a lifelong goal for showrunner and creator Leslye Headland. Her deep love of Star Wars and its high stakes, high-octane storytelling style and endless possibilities for new adventures always led to a desire to add her own contribution to the galaxy.

“I just love Star Wars—I always have,” says Headland. “Every time I’m asked the question ‘what is your fandom like?’ or ‘what do you love about Star Wars?’, it’s difficult for me to answer because I love it on a deep cellular level. I almost think Star Wars has been a part of my personality since I can remember.”

When “The Acolyte” producer Rayne Roberts got a call in 2019, saying that Headland would love to meet with her, she was intrigued. Roberts, who had seen several of Headland’s films and who had been a fan of her storytelling, was eager to meet her, but wasn’t aware she was such a big Star Wars fan. “I didn’t expect to be as surprised as I was when she came to my office and had an encyclopedia-like knowledge of Star Wars,” says Roberts.

Having this extensive knowledge of the franchise allowed Headland to have a specific starting point of creative exploration: What would you do if someone close to you turned to the dark side?

In channeling that question into what would eventually become the main storyline for the show, the exploration of the light and dark sides of the Force, the concept of duality and how that is teased out in the gray areas became a key part of the creative for the show. “To me, duality seems to be a theme that is just very primal for people. I think it goes all the way back to Greek mythology with the idea that there are two parts of yourself. This element is even with George Lucas’ work, with the light and the dark side of the Force,” says Headland.

When it came to orienting the story within the existing Star Wars films and series, Headland had always been particularly interested in the timeframe before “Star Wars: The Phantom Menace.”

“When I saw that film I was just very interested in how the Jedi got to the place that they did,” says Headland. The era that leads into “The Phantom Menace” is known as The High Republic—an era seen in publishing and animation but never before in live action. It is marked by a time of great prosperity and peace where the Jedi are at the height of their power. The context of this backdrop was a perfect proving ground to litigate the dynamics of duality within the characters created for the show.

When it comes to the tonal references for the show, Headland drew inspiration from many different films, including “Kill Bill,” “Frozen,” “Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon” and other Wuxia martial art films. “To me, Star Wars has always been about family members with opposing beliefs and the drama that comes out of that,” says Headland. “When crafting ‘The Acolyte,’ I took inspiration from media that highlighted familial dynamics while indulging in spectacle.”

The result is a unique entry to the Star Wars galaxy designed for all audiences. “At its core, ‘The Acolyte’ is a mystery thriller that invites audiences into the gray areas of universal themes, such as power, right and wrong, light and dark, and is designed to make audiences really engage in the struggle to balance the duality,” says Headland.

“As a filmmaker, Leslye is a formidable talent with tremendous creative vision who happens to be a lifelong Star Wars fan. A combination of those elements made us really excited to work with her,” says Kathleen Kennedy, President of Lucasfilm and executive producer on “The Acolyte.” “We’re so proud of the series. The characters are nuanced and conflicted, the environments are immersive, and it will give audiences a look into the galaxy during a time that they’ve never seen before.”

NEW CHARACTERS

MAE ANISEYA

In order for “The Acolyte” to further explore the light and dark, right and wrong, balance and imbalance, the series needed an actor who could step in and embody duality onscreen. Headland had seen Amandla Stenberg’s performances in “The Hate U Give” and “The Hunger Games” and was impressed by the young actor’s talent.

This led Headland to invite Stenberg to meet with her and discuss her still-secret project.

Stenberg left the meeting “in an utter state of shock” and “went home in a daze,” remembering the incredulous feeling of being presented with the opportunity. “It felt like being hit by a speeding train of fantasy and magic and possibility,” says Stenberg about joining the Star Wars galaxy. “I just don’t think it’s something that you expect is going to happen to you. And the implications of it are so grandiose and the amount of souls that it touches spans generations and decades.”

The more Headland continued to work with Stenberg, the more impressed she became, “Exploring good and evil immediately encourages you to find duality within your protagonist. And Amandla is someone who can understand that on an intellectual and spiritual level. And working with her, I’m seeing her actually putting it into practice. And actually, visualizing it. And bringing it to life.”

THE JEDI

In “The Acolyte,” the duality theme teases out within the Jedi Order as well. “The Jedi in most Star Wars media are so monolithically good,” says Headland. “Every institution—no matter how big and how noble and how good—has individuals within it. And all individuals are fallible and flawed.”

Headland continues, “So, the most difficult part of the show was letting go of my deep admiration for the Jedi and trying to treat them the way that beings might behave in the situations that I’ve put them in...finding the weakness of the Jedi and kind of interrogating them was something that was difficult for me.”

The show features a whole new slate of Jedi, including Lee Jung-jae as Master Sol, Carrie-Anne Moss as Master Indara, Dafne Keen as Jecki, Charlie Barnett as Yord, Dean-Charles Chapman as Master Torbin and Joonas Suotamo as Kelnacca, the first Wookiee Jedi in live-action. Rebecca Henderson is tasked with bringing fan-favorite Master Vernestra Rwoh from the “The High Republic” novels to life.

Master Sol, played by Lee Jung-jae, is central to the conflict of the story and Headland knew it would require a special actor to take on that role.

“Lee Jung-jae knows how to switch from being emotionally available and vulnerable to being completely guarded and in control,” shares Headland. “He knows how to be formidable and intimidating, and then he can switch to being just absolutely heartbreaking in terms of how fragile he is. I don’t know many actors who can do that.”

“Honestly, I still can’t believe that I’m in Star Wars. I’m still trying to be cool about it,” says Lee. “What fascinated me was how much the Star Wars galaxy and Leslye’s new story synchronized. I love the story about chance encounters, longing for precious people from one’s past and also overcoming obstacles to live for the future.”

Another prolific actress viewers meet is Carrie-Anne Moss who plays Master Indara.

On being cast, Moss said, “Having the opportunity to work on a Star Wars production was something I don’t think I ever imagined that I would do.” She went on to say, “What I love about the approach that Leslye did in telling this story, is that we see it from two perspectives. Anything has multiple perspectives. As a human being I’m interested in that.”

Moss adds, “The number one reason I wanted to do it was the opening scene. Leslye was able to articulate to me what she wanted in this opening scene, which is a huge action scene, fight scene, between my character and Amandla’s character. I haven’t really done anything in that way in a long time in terms of fighting, in terms of choreography. So, I was super excited and wanted to do that.”

Dafne Keen and Charlie Barnett’s characters are an unlikely duo—a competitive Padawan and Jedi Knight respectively—who are assisting Master Sol in his investigation.

Yord lives by the Jedi code and “has no space for the uncontrolled,” according to Barnett. “You can’t prepare for the unexpected. Yord knows that’s impossible, but he feels having control of himself and those around him helps prepare him for any situation.”

Barnett, who previously worked with Headland on “Russian Doll,” shared that coming into the show he had the utmost faith in the series from the very beginning, knowing that Headland was at the helm. “She is one of the most valuable directors that I’ve ever worked with. She’s willing to throw things away and move into a different direction in an instant, which is exciting because it makes it more of a playful element.”

Like Yord, Jecki can be “really rigid and rule prone,” says Dafne Keen. However, being a younger Jedi, Jecki’s character adapts to her environment and the people she’s around.

“I think what makes her a great Jedi is her capacity to learn and to grow,” says Keen. “She’s funny. She’s clever. And I love the Yord-Jecki dynamic.”

Vernestra Rwoh was a Jedi that Headland identified early on to include in the show. Fans of “The High Republic” novels enjoyed Rwoh’s adventures as an idealistic Padawan, and now audiences will see another side to the character in “The Acolyte”—an older, more experienced Vernestra.

Says Rebecca Henderson, “One of things I thought about a lot when beginning my work on Vernestra was what happens to a child prodigy as they grow up? And seeing her one hundred years after she’s been seen in the publishing series was intriguing to me. She’s very powerful. Very settled in a way that’s different than when she was sixteen. She just knows herself very well and, in some ways, has seen it all. I found that playing what was going through her mind was very intriguing and interesting.”

AND MORE...

Audiences will also meet a new group of Witches in “The Acolyte.” “There are people who are Force sensitive, but are not necessarily part of the Jedi Order,” Headland shared.

Jodie Turner-Smith plays Mother Aniseya, who leads a coven on a planet called Brendock. Mother Aniseya is a powerful, mythical figure—even for her own people. “She has abilities that are beyond anything that any of them have ever seen,” says Turner-Smith. “And for that reason, they follow her.”

“I really grasp the largeness of being involved in something like this,” adds Turner-Smith. “It sounded like something that was so interesting creatively—something that I know we had not yet seen in the Star Wars universe.”

The vast world of “The Acolyte” extends beyond Force users—it’s also populated by merchants, droids, aliens and more—people just looking to get by in the galaxy. One of these characters, Qimir, played by Manny Jacinto, is an apothecary owner who has survived in some of the shadier starports of the galaxy. “He’s a bit of an aloof character with a tinge of mischief and humor,” says Jacinto.

While writing the role of Qimir, Headland knew that the only person who could play him was Manny Jacinto. “If he hadn’t done it, I think I probably would have rewritten the character,” admits Headland.

Jacinto was impressed when he was able to step into the galaxy far, far away. “My first day on set was in the apothecary, in a marketplace,” shares Jacinto. “There are a lot of people around, a lot of businesses—you really feel like you’re in a different world. The ‘pinch me’ moments have never stopped. And I don’t think they ever will.”

DESIGNING THE WORLD OF “THE ACOLYTE”

With a brand-new story set during a never-before-seen era in live action, The High Republic, the team who brought the world of “The Acolyte” to life visually had their work cut out for them.

The era—marked by a time of great peace and prosperity in the galaxy where the Jedi are at the height of their power—is a golden age pre-dating the events of “Star Wars: The Phantom Menace” by approximately 100 years. While the show revisits familiar settings like the galactic capital city, Coruscant, lush new worlds were imagined by a team of artists who dreamed them up specifically for the show to reflect the flourishing Republic.

A key design theme for the show was color, which was a tool implemented to reflect that prosperity, but also the shifting power dynamics that are within the story. Infusing color into the world of “The Acolyte” was key to represent the nebulous motivations of characters versus the clear stratification of good versus evil that is present in design themes in a lot of Star Wars projects.

Kevin Jenkins, the mind behind the production design on 2019’s “Star Wars: The Rise of Skywalker,” lent his creativity to building-out the many new worlds for “The Acolyte,” which were filmed on practical locations and bespoke set builds in England, Wales and Madeira, Portugal. The choice to film the majority of the show practically was an intentional one by filmmakers to really ground the series in lush, real-world details in homage to the original trilogy of Star Wars films.

The task of designing a new era of Star Wars live action was one that filled Jenkins with both excitement and trepidation—designing a show that is set approximately 100 years before anything else seen in live action meant not being able to use key design elements that would come into existence generations after these characters. “You have to remember that they weren’t at war in the middle of the Roman Empire,” says Jenkins. “What Rome looked like at 400 B.C. as compared to 5 A.D. was not the same, so we took that approach with creating an older, more peaceful version of the galaxy than we’ve seen so far.”

Jenkins was tasked with the challenge of developing his own visual language for this new era. Part of this meant re-imagining everything, from the design of spaceships all the way down to which style of lights were used in interiors.

CHARACTER LOOKS

In her close collaboration with Headland, costume designer Jennifer Bryan felt the garments for the show not only had to work functionally for all of the action sequences, but they also had to provide context for the cultures of the new worlds being introduced. Inspiration wise, her references were widespread across ancient global civilizations, including North African Berbers, Morocco, Mongolia and Siberia.

Fulfilling the brief of infusing color into the world was quite a literal challenge for Bryan. Colors like blacks, dark grays, whites and creams have an established representative dichotomy of good versus evil, so aligning on new tones with no pre-established meaning was a challenge. Deep purples were a color that she latched onto. “It’s a universal color that denotes royalty and high stature,” she explains. That context comes into play prominently as the season progresses.

Like the other department heads, hair and makeup designer Jeremy Woodhead, whose past credits include properties like “The Lord of the Rings,” “Cloud Atlas” and “Fantastic Beasts,” was also intrigued by the challenge of taking on a whole new era in a storied franchise. When designing unique looks for this show, Woodhead referenced many titles in the Star Wars catalog.

To create the look for Amandla Stenberg’s Mae, the team worked on a bespoke process to give her wig weight and movement. The locks on Stenberg’s hairpieces were inspired by African tribes that used clay to create these looks.

Kamanza Amihyia, key hair and makeup artist, explains the process they used to achieve the desired effect: “Jeremy came up with the incredible idea of using acrylic. I never thought of using acrylic to paint on the head. The wigs were going to be washed, they were going to be wet and sustain wear and tear. Each individual strand is painted with eight different colors, and in the beginning, we were painting it with a brush.” Ultimately, the team decided on a rolling technique, done with acrylic paint for durability purposes in lieu of mud that was traditionally used.

Makeup wise, the show features hundreds of alien creatures. One of the core Jedi, Jecki, played by Dafne Keen, features a full-on makeup look. “Jecki’s makeup look was a lot because it’s a prosthetic. There's a lot of product on the skin and, normally, if somebody gets hot, the makeup starts to run off. But Dafne was fantastic. She didn't touch it," comments Amihya.

STUNTS

Headland worked with a fabulous stunt team, including stunt coordinator Mark Ginther and Chris Cowan, action choreographer and 2nd unit director, to bring her vision for a more martial arts-heavy show to life.

Ginther assembled a stylistically diverse team to collaborate on the final effect. Says Ginther, "We assembled a team of designers: we have Guillermo Grispo, and we have Lu Junchang. We took what they have and collaborated with our fight arranger, Daren Nop. Their talents mixing it together gave us the feeling we wanted—a combo of heavy martial arts to hand-to-hand combat with Lu Junchang, and the weapons fall more into what Guillermo does."

The martial arts—which bring a distinctive element to the choreography—is a mix between Kung Fu, Kenjutsu, Filipino Kali and kickboxing techniques.

Chris Cowan was integral to the way the stunt sequences were captured. "The way I wanted to approach it was to really dedicate the camera and the edit to the action," he says. "I like to approach it knowing exactly what we're going to be cutting to." To achieve this fully, stunt coordinator Mark Ginther used the Unreal Engine 5 technology to digitize environments created by Kevin Jenkins' team to plan the choreography. The tool allows them to use motion capture to maximize the movement design, but also to plan for efficiency in camera movement.

VFX & SOUND

Lucasfilm's acclaimed visual effects studio Industrial Light & Magic and sound house Skywalker Sound rounded out the world of the show.

ILM, who contributed 2,000 shots to the series, worked on environment extensions, space sequences, action sequences, effects on new creatures and more. VFX Supervisor Julian Foddy and VFX Producer Carlos Ciudad oversaw the work on set and through post, in conjunction with producer and Chief Creative Officer of ILM, Rob Bredow. The VFX approach to the show was grounded very much in 'How would George Lucas have done this?' And that was by utilizing full sets, practical creatures and effects, and allowing the VFX budget to be focused on 'creating the impossible.' Working hand in hand with the showrunner and production designer ensured a linear and streamlined creative process.

Episode 103, where the Jedi first meet the Witches on Brendock, embodies the creative process perfectly: a collaboration of set build and practical effects, but with VFX adding the physical manifestation of the Witches Force as the storytelling finish. The ethereal 'Force Aurora' concept was pitched and designed entirely by Julian Foddy/ILM, and embodies the restrained, subtler and often imperceptible use of VFX within the series.

From the creaks of a noodle drying wheel on Ueda, to the bustle of the freighter that housed the Mek Neks, Skywalker Sound, known for being the keyholder to the vault of Star Wars sounds, brought “The Acolyte” to life. Says Sound Designer Kimberly Patrick, “From our first conversation, Leslye and I agreed that we wanted the sound design of the show to reference Ben Burtt’s original design as much as possible while also exploring new sounds and/or new elements of established Star Wars sounds.”

To pay homage to classic Star Wars sounds and blend them with new ones, the team went above and beyond to give each lightsaber its own unique sound identity. Says Patrick, “I decided to focus on the lightsaber ignites and steady hums. For ignites, the base sound is a remastered version of a classic lightsaber ignite. In addition, I recorded and then processed various paper tears, as well as added an explosive element to give it more weight. For the steady hums, I used Ben’s original hum, but pitched it differently for different characters. I then ran the pitched hum through a plugin that added a small amount of feedback distortion, which gave the hum a slightly grittier quality.”

MUSIC

Michael Abels, best-known for his scores for the Oscar®-winning film “Get Out,” and for Jordan Peele’s “Us,” for which he won the World Soundtrack Award and multiple critics awards, has crafted a dynamic score to “The Acolyte.” For Abels, the sounds of Star Wars have always been just as important as any other element of the film’s designs. The challenge for him was balancing the legacy of Star Wars scores with forging a new path forward for this new set of characters and this new story.

“There are times when the music is very Star Wars, so it lives with the rest of the galaxy. And there are times where you see things we haven’t seen in the other films or shows,” says Abels. “And it needs to feel that way. There are moments that feel familiar, and ones that feel unfamiliar—and this is by design. And so we started working on what pieces would fall on one side of the spectrum or the other.”

The Noodle Shop sequence at the beginning of the show manifests this philosophy. As Abels explains, “You start with key signals of Star Wars, but it gets more percussive as the fight begins. We wanted it to feel both primitive and a bit kinetic as the fight builds. However, when Indara’s saber is drawn, that changes the stakes, and the score is a harkening back to traditional Star Wars language there.”

CREATURES

Neal Scanlan, who has worked on seven Star Wars projects, including “The Force Awakens,” “Rogue One” and “Andor,” is the creature effects, special makeup effects and droid supervisor for the “The Acolyte.”

Scanlan’s team, who first came together for “The Force Awakens,” have “welded together,” leading to a continuity of ideas and methodology.

When approaching his work on “The Acolyte,” Scanlan and Headland conversed about every droid and creature’s purpose. From the thieving alien that can be spotted in the background to a handheld droid companion, Scanlan asked, “Is this creature going to help tell the story or be in the background to help generate a sense of another world?”

As designs took shape, the renowned creature creator and Headland drafted character backstories, such as for Kelnacca, who stands apart from other Wookiees, not just by the additional technology housed in his face to provide more animated expressions than previous Wookiee designs, but by his shaved and tattooed head, and beaded hair. This helped Scanlan and his team understand how he would be different from Star Wars’ most popular Wookiee, Chewbacca. Character backstories are, “a playful thing to think about,” says Scanlan. “Kelnacca is intelligent. He’s a Jedi, but a little bit vain. He likes the way he looks, so he’s going to look after his hair to maintain the sense of who he is.”

On creatures and droids in “The Acolyte” as a whole, Scanlan says that there’s a familiarity to what viewers will see. “Effective design is one that you somehow feel you wouldn’t be so surprised if you were to open your garage and see a droid was there,” he says.

A long time ago in a country far, far away.... JOONAS SUOTAMO (Kelnacca) grew up in Espoo, Finland, and first became interested in acting through his performances in local plays during his youth. Later on, a basketball scholarship offered him the opportunity to go and study at Pennsylvania State University in the United States. During his time at university, Suotamo chose film studies over acting because of the perceived lack of roles for tall people. Never one to give up on his dreams, his film studies and interest in acting paid off when he was cast in the highly anticipated blockbuster movie "Star Wars: The Force Awakens" to act as the double for the iconic character of Chewbacca. After the film's massive success, his hard work was awarded. Suotamo became Chewbacca in "Star Wars: The Last Jedi" and continued throughout the last chapter of the Skywalker trilogy, "Star Wars: The Rise of Skywalker." He was most recently seen in the Disney+ series, "Willow."

CARRIE-ANNE MOSS (Master Indara) was born and raised in Vancouver, Canada. At age 20, after studying at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts, she moved to Europe to pursue a career in modeling. While in Europe, she was cast in the television show "Dark Justice," which brought her to Los Angeles for season two. Once in LA she began getting more opportunities, one of which was a TV series "Matrix" (which coincidentally presaged the movie that would later make her famous), another was being cast as a series regular for Aaron Spelling's television spectacle "Models Inc."

The late, great casting director Mali Finn invited Moss to audition for The Wachowskis' and their top-secret sci-fi action project. Following a challenging process of physical and character screen tests, they ultimately gave her the opportunity to create the iconic, cyber-warrior Trinity in the record-breaking, award-winning and internationally successful "The Matrix," which galvanized her place in cinematic history in one of the highest grossing R-rated sci-fi action franchises of all time and as one of Hollywood's most sought-after actresses.

Directly following her new-found success Moss received a wide range of scripts, but it was the complex screenplay "Memento" that stirred her creative senses. From writer/director

Christopher Nolan “Memento” became one of the most critically acclaimed and, at that time, the largest grossing independent film in history.

Her remarkable “Memento” performance won her the coveted Spirit Award for Best Supporting Female that year. She has gone on to receive numerous accolades for her performances, including MTV, SAG® and Teen Choice Award nominations. She was recognized with a Vancouver Critics Circle Award for Best Actress in a Canadian Film for “Fido,” and she won a Genie Award for Best Performance by an Actress in a Supporting Role for her performance in “Snow Cake.”

Some of her other notable film credits include “Red Planet,” the Oscar®-nominated “Chocolat,” shocking “Suspect Zero,” comedy “Fido,” box office hit “Disturbia,” gut wrenching “Unthinkable,” award-winning “Snow Cake” and Paul W.S. Anderson’s epic 3D-feature “Pompeii.”

Throughout her career, Moss has been attracted to compelling television projects including CBS’s “Vegas,” sci-fi “Humans” and bi-lingual English/Norwegian detective series “Wisting,” but television audiences may know her best from “Marvel’s Jessica Jones” as powerful and enduring attorney Jerry Hogarth.

Mother and wife above all else, Moss is an actress, teacher, seeker, and storyteller. Her deep calling to connect with women led her to create Annapurna Living as a platform and portal for growth and nourishment. Now, with a community of women all over the world, Moss teaches online courses designed to help women and mothers find their voice and to step into their grace.

Moss will next be seen in Roadside Attractions’ “Accidental Texan” and has wrapped principal photography in director Lowell Dean’s feature “Die Alone.”
